

Eating McDonald's gave me TRIPLETS! Vegetarian who was told she would never have children gives birth to three babies after turning to a daily diet of meat

- Laura Dixon had IVF after trying to conceive naturally for 10 years
- The first cycle had to be abandoned after her ovaries swelled dangerously
- She conceived after the second but had a miscarriage at eight weeks
- Decided to improve her chances of a successful pregnancy by eating increasing her protein intake and eating three portions of meat a day
- Gave birth to triplets Max, Mason and Mia after the third, and final, cycle
- Mrs Dixon has since returned to her vegetarian lifestyle

A lifelong vegetarian told she would never have children has given birth to triplets after she started eating meat.

Laura Dixon, 34, turned to IVF after trying for ten years to get pregnant naturally, but during her second cycle of treatment she suffered a miscarriage.

When she became pregnant during her final round of IVF, she was warned she had a high risk of another miscarriage or a dangerously early labour.

Ms Dixon, a PA from Essex, said: 'When the sonographer found a third heartbeat I remember shouting "oh no" and crying - thinking I'd lose them all.

'After losing one baby to a miscarriage, I thought I would never be able to carry three.

'But then my hunger kicked in and despite never eating meat, I craved it. I ate about six meals a day.

'It all seems like a blur now. I just remember the cravings were so strong that I would wake up in the night and make my husband go and get me a McDonald's.

Mrs Dixon said that her meat cravings became so strong that she had to get her husband, Tim, to go out and buy her McDonald's and Nandos - sometimes in the middle of the night

Mrs Dixon had both polycystic ovary syndrome and endometriosis and doctors believed this would prevent her conceiving as both conditions can cause infertility

Endometriosis is a condition which causes cells from the lining of the womb to develop outside of the uterine cavity. It causes pain and, often, infertility.

Polycystic ovary syndrome is a common condition that affects how a woman's ovaries work.

It causes cysts to develop in the ovaries, stops the regular release of eggs, and causes the body to produce high levels of 'male hormones' called androgens.

She underwent two laparoscopies in a bid to correct the problems but both were unsuccessful.

Since the triplets were born, the couple have gone through 8,000 nappies and done more than 10,000 feeds

Her first cycle of IVF failed when she developed dangerously swollen ovaries and treatment had to be abandoned.

She became pregnant during the second cycle using frozen eggs but miscarried at eight weeks.

During the third IVF attempt she got ovarian hyperstimulation syndrome but decided to proceed at her own risk and two fertilised eggs developed.

Ovarian hyperstimulation syndrome can occur after taking medications that stimulate the ovaries.

It causes the ovaries to swell and produce too many follicles.

Symptoms include nausea, vomiting, abdominal pain and bloating.

In severe cases it can be life-threatening as it can cause a blood clot in an artery or vein, kidney and liver dysfunction and breathing difficulties.

However, on her 33rd birthday Mrs Dixon and her husband heard three little heartbeats and on Mr Dixon's 33rd birthday doctors told them they were expecting identical boys and a girl.

Max was born weighing 3lb 12oz, Mason was 5lb 4oz and Mia weighed 5lb 15oz - all three were born by C-section within a minute of each other.

Since becoming a mother, Mrs Dixon has continued to go to McDonald's - but has reverted to her vegetarian diet and only has a veggie-wrap and fries

The triplets, now 14 months, were allowed home from hospital just two weeks after their birth.

Since then Mrs Dixon and Mr Dixon, 34, a finance manager, have gone through 8,000 nappies and done more than 10,000 feeds.

Medics believe Mrs Dixon's protein boost will have contributed to her successful pregnancy.

Nutritionist Jo Travers, who runs The London Nutritionist, said: 'There is a lot of evidence that women experience taste changes throughout the pregnancy, which in turn can alter their preferences as they progress through the trimesters.'

Since becoming a mother Ms Dixon has continued to go to McDonald's - but has reverted to her vegetarian diet and only has a veggie-wrap and fries.

CANCER VICTIM'S IVF TWINS

AN Australian woman who became infertile after life-saving cancer surgery is expecting twins, thanks to a revolutionary IVF treatment. The 30-year-old had tissue from her ovaries stored when they were removed seven years ago.

Now she is 26 weeks pregnant after a procedure doctors say could potentially revolutionise fertility treatment.

Melbourne IVF and The Royal Melbourne Hospital helped her produce two healthy eggs by transplanting tiny slices of her frozen ovarian tissue into her abdominal wall and stimulating it with a mild hormone treatment.

The eggs were retrieved after IVF and two healthy embryos implanted in her uterus, in what was the first successful graft outside the pelvis.

I think any 'lifelong vegetarian' would be well aware that meat is a poor source of protein compared to something like soya. I know pregnancy cravings are hard to resist, but is it really worth it to risk heart disease and bowel cancer? Articles like this which perpetuate ignorance surrounding vegetarian diets make it really hard for pregnant and breastfeeding women. - Andy, Manchester, United Kingdom, 02/9/2013 17:00 I think anyone with any knowledge at all, would realise SOYA is very bad for people with PCOS...like this woman. it contains phytoestrogens which have a negative impact on PCOS. As a milk allergy sufferer I have had soya my whole life, and strangely I developed PCOS as an adult and fertility problems. Now I drink almond milk, much safer and tastier too.

My word, the militant vegies are out in force on this one! Never seen so much anti-meat misinformation in one place before as this comments section! Have a nice rare fillet steak for lunch - it'll make you all feel better and not so grumpy. So you all don't eat meat - fine. But stop getting stroppy just because others eat what nature intended humans to eat. We have sharp canines for eating meat, and broad, flat incisors for eating vegetables. If you vegies wish to eat an unnatural diet, go ahead, the rest of us don't care. Just hold onto the gas until we have got out of the lift.

Nothing new here. It is a common fact that a diet of protein and fat increase fertility. There are many stories on the web where people went low carb and became pregnant after failing infertility treatment multiple times. Carbs suppress so many things in the human body it has become a joke! Has nobody noticed the correlation between the increase in carbohydrate consumption around the world and fertility problems? Science and the pharmaceutical industry have failed big time whereas the low carb diet is constantly proven to be the correct way of life!

For all you vegetarian knockers, I've been a vegetarian for between 40 to 50 years and had two children, very easily. I'm also extremely healthy although now nearly 70 and have the arteries of a 20 year old according to my doctors. My blood pressure is low, my cholesterol is so good and always has been, I'm not anaemic the only problem is a vit D deficiency at times. Which considering I live in Australia is unusual but I hate, and I mean HATE the sun and keep out of it at all times and covered up so I have to take a supplement. Not that Vitamin D has anything to do with vegetarianism. I'm all set to live to a ripe old age and with long living genes in my family I should make 120. So here's for a record and living it well and happily. Just adding, this article is really bad inasmuch as it supports people eating all the fast food under the sun when pregnant, not giving the baby a chance to have a good start to life. Very bad reporting.

So three more mouths to feed, three more school places to find, as if we don't have more than enough kids already. I'm pleased I won't be around in 40/50 years, this country will be unbearable by then; pop pushing 80/90 million I reckon. Good luck to the next generation, you're going to need it! BTW no, I don't have any children!

Leave the lass alone, she isn't saying that meat made her pregnant but the change in lifestyle made her healthier to carry her babies full term, our bodies can do amazing things when we need them too! Good luck to you and your beautiful babies, after suffering from PCOS myself I would have taken to eat anything to help me fall pregnant before I finally had my little girl last year.
