

Non-Animal-Tested Companion Animal Food

If you have companion animals, it is likely you will do whatever you can to ensure their safety and comfort, including feeding them the very best food. What some pet food companies are hiding from consumers, however, is that animals just like yours are confined to laboratories and subjected to invasive and harmful tests for claims on their products.

PETA has compiled a list of companies that do not test their pet food on animals and that only carry out palatability tests with companion animals at home. (Palatability studies involve feeding animals new formulations to see if they will eat or enjoy the food.) To find out more about animal testing for pet foods, cosmetics, household products and medical research, visit PETA.org.uk.

All the companies listed overleaf have signed PETA's statement of assurance pledging that they do not directly or indirectly conduct harmful studies on animals.
