When Moon Shells Invade

when moon shells invade, there will be shooting stars
and spring cleaning
losts and founds
and little things that matter nostalgia
and legends born
misadventures
and confessions of love hope again
child spirits (laughing when you're not supposed to)
at last,
at last,
at last!

PROHIBIDO FIJAR ART.

United they stand, these two men in their awful suits in the midst of camera lightening. United they stand in hate. They hate the white parcels sent inexplicably to their secretaries from nameless sources who appear on tapes. They hate those using the taxes for asylum, using up the taxes that could be used for bombing the countries those using the taxes are seeking sanctuary away from. They hate the impending doom and the impending threat in the world where they have been supposedly legitimately elected to lead. And they hate the fact they cannot understand all of this, cannot grasp why they must fight wars against a hidden enemy that for some reason hates them to the core just for being from the west: the dictators, the terrorists, the suicide bombers, the nameless who send the packages of powder, the people who would like democracy without the Macdonalds or coca-cola culture.

In the East, away from the sharp suits and the million dollar superbowl adverts, the peoples have become united in hope. Hope that they will not be accused that they are the source of the attack, the white powder or whatever extremist rant that has caused someone to kill someone somewhere. They hope they will not be accused so actions cannot be excused when the fresh faces march their way in. They hope these two will not make them their peoples move, have to use another country for sanctuary away from taxpayers bombs. They hope their hate will fade and the two will understand their beliefs, not confuse them as they constantly do with fanatasticism and proclaim that the east is evil. They hope that the two will eventually understand democracy can be created without a Hollywood epic or a double bacon cheese burger.

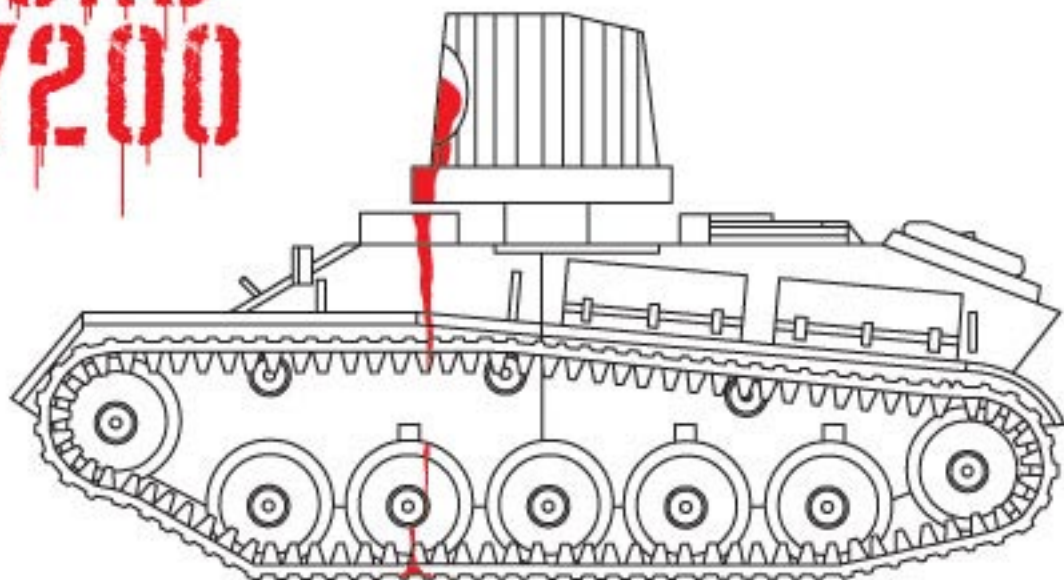

But when we look together as these two leaders, the so called most powerful men in the world, we see they are so united in hate and the peoples are so full of hope in the east the two's hate will not ruin their lives, that their unification as a political duet has divided the world. Bush and Blair together, the world divided. These two men, from backgrounds beggars in Africa can never dream of, have not brought stability or peace in their repeated rhetoric but have divided the world into two camps; hate in the west of things they cannot understand and hope in the east that the hate will not ruin their way of life. If they put their hate aside for once, stopped the cluster bombs and killing, and united everyone, not just themselves, then maybe the peace they mythically talk if could become a reality.

They may be united. But because they are united the world is divided into hate and hope and fear. Peoples hoping their home will not be next to be hit by the most powerful forces in the world. Peoples in the west full of hate for that religion, that culture that took the lives of brokers, commuters, travellers and their family, hate that means these two men get their taxes for their armies and divide the world a little bit further.

an auto-biography of a boy and a flower: an 11 year old boy rips out a plastic liner, piece by piece, converting an old sandbox into a small garden. fingers and shovels paw through the dry sands and hardened clay trying to breathe life into eachother.

lunch money is saved to buy packets of seeds which are scattered. hope sprouts his tiny heart.

10 years later with a flower held in his hand he sees himself having come full circle - holding a piece of himself that had grown separately, but parallel all those years. it was good to see an old friend that he had made so long ago, and together they felt nostalgic of the old days.

we had been created by eachother, and now i realize that it had grown me
